The origin of the state in Egypt. A view from Hierakonpolis and Elkab

The concept of proto-states as the first phase of state development in Egypt was introduced by Barry Kemp over 25 years and has meanwhile gained wide acceptance. However, recent research at Hierakonpolis and elsewhere indicates that the idea of more or less equally important proto-states should be reconsidered. The new evidence will be combined with information already known for a long time, allowing an updated interpretation of the development of social and political structure during the 4th and early 3rd millennium BC in Egypt.
